Deposit Insurance Wins

Walter J. Cummings, chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, reported to President Roosevelt on January 1 that 15,423 banks out of 15,644 had been found eligible for the new deposit insurance which became effective on that day. Of the 141 banks found ineligible, Mr. Cummings predicted that a number of them might be insured later.

Under the new law depositors with sums up to $5,000 may be insured against loss until July 1, when the insured amount will be raised to $10,000. The insurance fund is created by a subscription of $150,000,000 from the Federal Government to the capital stock of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, plus a subscription of $140,000,000 from the Federal Reserve Banks, and certain assessments levied on the insured banks.

The insurance law will banish the fear of the depositors for the safety of their money, and will do much to restore faith in the banking system. It was vigorously opposed by the organized bankers when the bill was under consideration by the special session of Congress last summer, and their forces are arrayed to weaken the law during the present session of Congress.
